

Melbourne Metropolitan Board of Works (MMBW) Plans

What are they?

These are comprehensive plans of inner and some outer suburbs showing built structure such as roads, paths and buildings and also property boundaries. The earliest of these date from 1892 to early 1900s.

They are available in three scales

40 ft to an inch

160 ft to an inch

400 ft to an inch

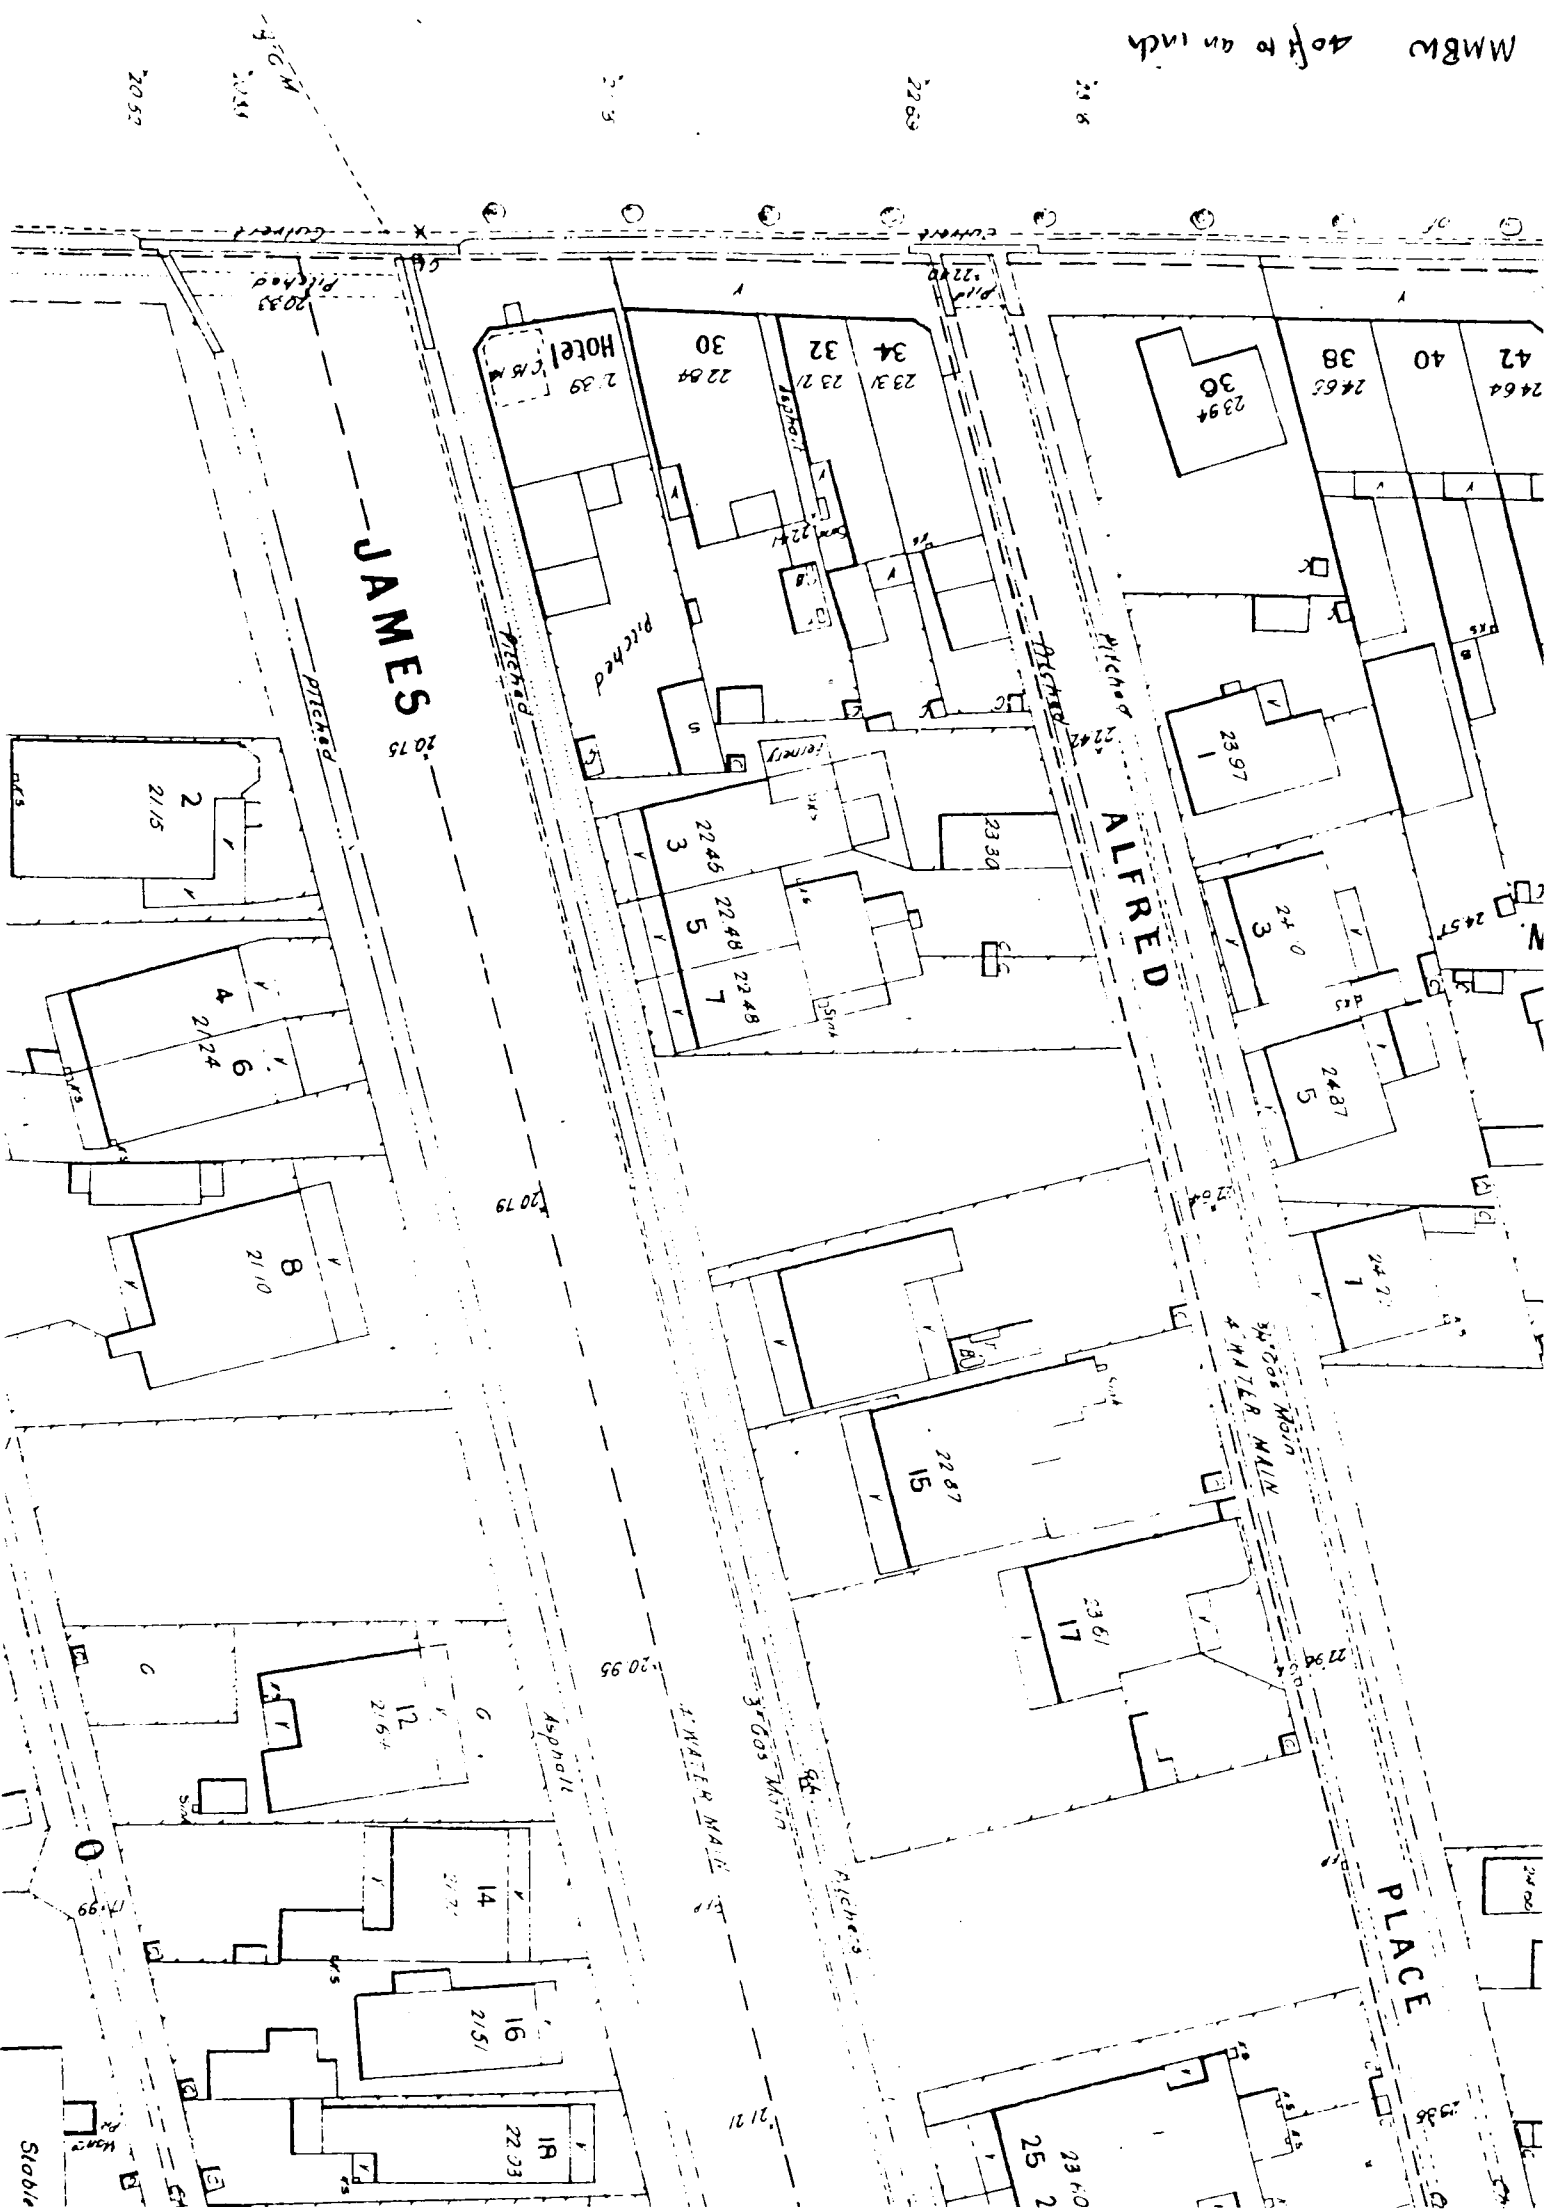

How are they useful?

MMBW plans give an accurate, detailed snapshot of a property at a particular time. They are useful for tracing the process of subdivision of the site, the physical development of particular buildings and for deducing earlier street numbering.

The 40 ft to an inch plans are the most relevant when researching a particular property. Information included at this scale includes

- The outline of any buildings on a site
- Position of fences, garden, lawns, outbuildings, verandahs, paths and driveways
- Early street numbers of each property (which may have since changed)
- Street names (which may not be the same as the current names)
- The name of the property (sometimes)

The 160 ft to an inch plans convey the degree of development of the street and general area. The 400 ft to an inch plans convey the pattern of development of the wider suburb. Neither of these larger scale plans include street numbers.

Sands and McDougall (Sands and Kenny) Directories

What are they?

These directories were published annually. They systematically list the occupants of each building street by street for all of Melbourne, and also list each occupant by surname. There are other directories, though none cover Melbourne for such a continuous period.

How are they useful?

Directories can be used to establish

- occupants of a building since its initial construction
- changes in occupancy and occupancy patterns
- when a building first appeared at a particular address
- changes in street numbers and street names
- the general character of a street or suburb at a particular time
- where an individual lived over their lifetime

As directories represent an annual survey, they will not list all the owners and occupants if these have repeatedly changed in a given year. Individuals who frequently move or have a transient lifestyle may not appear. Directories convey nothing about the physical nature of the building on a site.

How to use them

Entries are listed in two ways

- by surname
- by suburb, with north and south sides of each street listed alphabetically for in each suburb.

Be aware that street numbers and names may have changed. Sometimes small suburbs may be listed under larger adjacent suburbs.

Start at the earliest period for which the occupants and street number are known and work back in steps of five years. If any major changes in occupancy or numbering appear, search year by year to then determine the precise year of the change. (Use a table to record listings.)

Eventually a year will be reached for which there is either no entry for a site, or vacant lot. From this the approximate date at which a building was first constructed on a site can be deduced. (Search back several years further to confirm the site was not vacant on account of an earlier demolition)

Rate books

What are they?

Rate books are generally available for the nineteenth century and early twentieth century. They contain information about every rateable property in a suburb, which was collected annually.

How are they useful?

Rate books can convey the following information about a particular property

- When a building first appeared
- Basic facts about a building. I.e. Construction material, number of rooms.
- Whether a building has been enlarged, partially demolished, replaced.
- Who has owned a property, who has occupied it and their occupation
- Trends in the property value, which may also indicate its physical development.
- Changes in street numbering.
- The historic character and sequence of development of a street
- The process of subdivision of the site

How to use them

For each year streets are listed by ward. The streets within each ward are listed alphabetically at the beginning of each ward section, though within each ward section, the streets are not listed alphabetically. They are listed in the order in which the council official surveyed the suburb. (This was generally the same for each subsequent year.) Within each street section, each side is listed separately.

i.e. north side, then south side or east side, then west side.

1. Start at the most recent year available in the rate books. Locate the street in the alphabetical listing at the beginning of each ward section.
2. Scroll through entries until the relevant street is found.
3. Identify the property from either its street number or its relative position in the street. (If unsure, first check MMBW plans and directories to establish these.)
4. Copy out the relevant entry, noting the entry number. Compiling a table, check previous years moving back in steps of 3-5 years. (Use the entry number to locate the relative position of the property within the earlier rate books.) If major changes occur, check intervening years to pinpoint when.
5. Check back until only vacant land is listed for the property. The first mention of a building in the rate book description of the property in following years will indicate when a building was first constructed on the site.

Interpreting the information

Rate books are generally accurate, though minor discrepancies sometimes occur in the details of occupants and descriptions of properties.

Issues to consider

- The existing building may not be the earliest at a site. Indications of this might be a change from a timber to brick, or a house might replace stables on a property.
- Most streets were initially unnumbered, and numbering commonly changed.
- Has the name of the street been changed?
- Has the property always had its current boundaries? There may be no listing of vacant land for a site because it was part of a larger block that was subdivided. Check to see whether the number of listings in a street suddenly increased in a given year.

As suburbs developed, the large allotments sold in the initial crown land sales were typically subdivided, thus increasing the number rateable properties in later years.

Where to find them

North Melbourne, Melbourne and Malvern rate books are held on microfiche at Genealogy Section, La Trobe Library, (State Library of Victoria.)

Burchett Index

Melbourne City Council's Notices of Intention to Build (NOITB), are held at the Victorian Public Records Office (as VPRS 9288), The 39,000 original records cover the period 1850-1916, but for the Fitzroy area the records terminate in 1870. In about 1980, Winston Burchett produced a card index of about 15,000 of the more significant records.

This index is accessible in microfiche form at the State Library of Victoria and the Public Records Office of Victoria, and in card form at the Department of Transport Library (Infralib) at 121 Exhibition Street, Melbourne (appointments only 9655 8600). The data has also been digitised and has been added to the Australian Architectural Index.
